For those who are familiar with Dr. Leon Hammer's massive tome on Contemporary Chinese Pulse

Diagnosis, there are pulses that point to patterns that were advanced by Dr. Hammer's long-time teacher Dr. John H.F. Shen. Dr. Shen's patterns, being distinct in various respects from standard TCM patterns and at the very least raise the question: If I accept that this pattern exists, then just as importantly, how do I deal with this? Those who have studied up to a certain point with Dr. Hammer's designated instructors will have been exposed at least to a handful of Dr. Shen's formulas for patterns like "blood thick" and the "Qi Wild" situation among others. Discussed in this book are a large number of formulas used by Dr. Shen for various situations with some comments retained from Dr. Shen with more extensive commentary by the authors Dr. Leon Hammer and Hamilton Rotte. Anyone interested either in Contemporary Chinese Pulse Diagnosis and its relation to treatment as well as diagnosis would of course find the book interesting. Other people who have heard of the Ding family of Shanghai might want to see some of Shen's formulas that still show some of what seem to modern practitioners of TCM as light doses of the individual ingredients. I think the literature on modern TCM is becoming more voluminous, and access in English to decent versions of the classics make it possible for people to see how modern TCM has proceeded. Even so, interpretations of what those ancient texts mean is often the province of not only ancient, but modern commentators who sometimes have differing interpretations of the "old books". This book takes a particular lineage's point of view and shows how modern practitioners trained in that line of thinking think about herb formulas.
