Customer Reviews

I really wanted to like this book upon reading all the rave reviews. I eagerly opened it when it arrived imagining it would contain helpful "baby exercises" based on the latest neurological research that would help me encourage my child towards healthy development. I did my best to ignore the arrogant/self-righteous tone carried through by the author during the introduction, but was considerably disappointed to find nothing but banal generalizations and self-aggrandizing remarks about his program. Example: "Michelle has the time of her life all day long. (So do all the other kids)". Forgive me but, Michelle doesn't sound human! It's human to not have the time of your life perpetually doing acrobatics and reciting indoctrinated "encyclopedic knowledge" "all day long". A critical reader will immediately begin to suspect grandiosity and gross exaggeration on behalf of the author from remarks like these, but all this could be forgiven if it were not simultaneously juxtaposed with a not so subtle undertone of looking down on non-programmed "average" kids. It's this tone that comes out strongly in the charts - appending a number - along with helpful advice that, if a child hasn't achieved a certain physical feat by a certain time frame a good parent should "seek professional help" and also classify their children as "slow" (i.e, if they don't crawl by 5 months). Might I ask whose professional help one should seek? The author's online repository of medicating materials? All this seems innocuous until you get to the real kicker: "Sometimes, at this stage, babies cry when crawling. This is good, not bad. They're crying for a reason. The fast, deep respiration of crying actually gives them the additional oxygen they need to make easier the movement of their arms and legs for crawling.
