Sound Sense: Living And Learning With Hearing Loss

Synopsis

One out of every eight people between the ages of 18 and 67 in the United States has a hearing loss, estimated as 12 percent of the working-age population. Sound Sense: Living and Learning with Hearing Loss addresses the acute need of these people to function at the highest level in these income-earning years, the longest phase in their lives. In nine pointed chapters, author Sara Laufer Batinovich, who also has lost her hearing, shares her experience and knowledge in turning every challenge into an opportunity to become one's best self-advocate. Batinovich begins in the workplace, advising on winning a job, keeping it, and developing a long-term career, plus how to reduce stress and establish fulfilling professional relationships with colleagues. She offers tips on communication ranging from having sales people face you for easier speechreading to parsing boarding announcements at airports and play-by-play at ballparks. Her practical handbook also provides step-by-step guidance for getting a hearing aid or a cochlear implant and finding one's way through prickly insurance claim mazes. Sound Sense features information on finding a service dog, securing legally mandated accommodations for continuing education, tips on exercise and health, and even sensitive suggestions on strengthening personal relationships. Batinovich's vivacious style and her own anecdotes add an upbeat, genuine sensibility to her book's value as a positive guide to living with hearing loss.

Customer Reviews

This book provides wonderful insights for those of us who have relatives and friends with hearing problems. It introduces us, with humor and grace, to a whole world that we personally do not experience. After reading this book, I now understand better that dealing with hearing loss is not simply a matter of getting a hearing aid. There are obstacles that I never thought about or imagined. My thanks to the author for opening this world up to us.
