Customer Reviews

I really enjoyed reading this book. It is well-written, in a witty and fluent style. The idea is age-old but the author brought it out in a new format: learn from the smart and strength of animals, for developing your business and human skills. The author progresses with a certain methodology, discussing a good choice of characteristic animals, pointing out for each animal its greatest powers and abilities, then inviting the reader to take them as a metaphor for developing his or her own winning abilities and character traits. I found the knowledge the author brings in about those various animals quite remarkable. Also outstanding is his large range of quotations of a variety of more or less famous authors and personalities. This is truly a selfhelp book in the best sense of the world. Each chapter covers another animal, except two chapters that deal with the human being as just another "animal" and those two chapters I will not focus upon in my review, while they are very readable. I found it useful that each chapter contains a short summary that briefly notes the main positive characteristics of the animal covered. Each chapter also contains one success story, all of which I found interesting to read. I shall now briefly give an overview over the range the book covers. The author starts his journey in the animal realm with the question "What is Instinct?" He points out that while the term instinct in the stricter sense belongs only to the animal realm as humans have a more developed psychic setup, which is not just "instinctual," the author uses the term "instinct" what most other authors including myself would call "intuition."
