I've had eczema and hives off and on for years but I didn't take them seriously until I started waking up in the middle of the night scratching. Over the counter remedies only brought temporary relief and didn't address the root cause. Some web research led me to the concept of an elimination diet. There are various ways to approach the diet; I chose the one outlined in Elimination Diet 101 because the elimination phase also serves as a detoxification period. The author's approach is to completely stop consuming a list of common foods that humans react to in varying degrees: gluten containing grains (wheat, rye, etc), soy, citrus fruits, nightshade vegetables, corn, eggs, dairy plus caffeine and processed sugar and artificial sweeteners. After a couple weeks the items are reintroduced in order from least troublesome to highly suspect. For me, I tested citrus and nightshade vegetables as soon as I could just to increase the variety of foods I could eat. I've worked my way through and now have soy, gluten and dairy left to test. This diet will challenge you. You'll have to come up with substitutes for some of your favorite foods and wait for a couple of weeks for all your cravings to subside. It was three weeks before I stopped feeling peckish all the time. Fortunately Mrs. Lehner provided a variety of delicious recipes for both the elimination phase and for reintroducing items to your diet. I loved the use of fresh ingredients in her recipes. I was also led to try some gluten free and vegan recipes that I otherwise would not have tried. I'm not suffering at all! In five weeks I've learned a lot about my relationship with food and how dependent I was upon items prepared outside the home.

This cookbook has helped me find things out about myself that I didn't realize I needed to know. I began my journey a little over a year ago, when my boyfriend's sister and sister in law provided me with knowledge about food, our bodies and how the two work together for better or worse. I grew up thinking stomach aches were just a sign of eating 'too much.' I never once considered it being my body 'speaking' to me, telling me that it didn't like the food(s) that I consumed. Until about a year and a half ago, I had never had an allergy with medicine, food, etc. Then one day I realized that after eating ice cream (that I had consumed numerous times in my life) my stomach was in knots, I had migraines, bloating and I just couldn't seem to use the bathroom regularly (this didn't worry me too much because honestly, I never really paid close attention to my bowel movements.) The thing that worried and stressed me out most was that my skin would break out with acne within the next 12-48 hours and it was never just one. After this it turned into a whole 'dairy' thing. Ice cream, cheese, butter, milk, etc. Next was gluten. Once I was more in-tune with my body, I realized that after eating even just a subway sandwich my stomach would be upset, bloated and I was always in a great deal of pain. I wasn't ready to give up everything that I enjoyed (I mean cheese goes ON everything, milk is IN everything, and who doesn't love a good sandwich?) Bringing my concerns to my boyfriend's family, I learned about ways to help ease the pain (probiotics, essential oils, and last but not least the Elimination Diet) It was pretty tricky because I'm a part time college student, part time employee for the Walt Disney Company on a tight budget but after a few tries I seemed to get the basics down and just do it.
